Evidence supporting the use of SLS also comes from eye-tracking research, which has established that our eyes are drawn to subtitles, so that anyone with even basic reading skills automatically begins to read them. And indeed, the data collected throughout India after the introduction of SLS showed that just 30 minutes of weekly exposure for five years doubled the number of children able to read fluently. Equally significant were the findings among adults, with the number of newspaper readers more than doubling among regular SLS viewers over the same period.

35 The Indian experience holds promise for other countries grappling with the same challenge. Kothari himself has established an organization called PlanetRead to help promote literacy worldwide, and has already found partners in Asia, Africa, and Latin America who are interested in implementing SLS for the benefit of local populations. As he puts it, "This is a solution that will travel, 40 that can travel, because every culture around the world today watches some form of songs in their own language."
